GERMAN SHORTHAIRED POINTERS

The breed that won Westminster 2005.

If you want a dog who:

- ✚ Is sleek-coated and tautly-muscled, a true athlete
 - ✚ Is energetic and vigorous, primarily bred to be a bird hunting dog
 - ✚ Is more versatile than the average English Pointer – many have multiple titles in a variety of activities
 - ✚ Is good-natured with almost everyone
 - ✚ Is easy to groom

A German Shorthaired Pointer may be right for you

If you don't want to deal with:

- ✚ High, intense energy that requires lots of daily exercise
 - ✚ Barking, hyperactivity, and destructive chewing that often results from too much confinement and lack of attention
 - ✚ Exuberant jumping on people
 - ✚ Obedience training to instill self-discipline and control

A German Shorthaired Pointer may not be right for you

The German Shorthaired Pointer is a handful for the normal household. This is a working hunting dog that needs a great deal of physical exercise and whose mind needs to be kept stimulated through frequent learning. So, if you would rather sit on the couch and watch TV instead of going out for a run, this breed of dog may not be the best choice for you. The amount of mischief he can get into when bored will truly dismay you.

If you simply want a companion dog, and don't have the time or inclination to take your dog running or hiking or swimming or biking, AND to get involved in weekly obedience classes, or hunting or field activities, this breed of dog may not be the best choice for you.

German Shorthaired Pointers were never intended to be simply household pets, but are marvelous with proper exercise and training. Their working behaviors that excel them in the field can be inappropriate in a normal household. Trying to suppress these inborn behaviors, without providing alternate outlets for their high energy level, is extremely difficult.

Unless you're interested in working your dog in the hunting and field activities which are his major purpose for being, this breed of dog may not be the best choice for you. Anything less is a waste of his marvelous potential.
